Graphically, however, relations are seen; there is an appeal to the eye, as well as to the intellect. A fact is emphatic in proportion to the number of avenues through which it makes its appeal. But graphic presentation alone will not suffice. Through classification and tabulation, facts are reduced to logical order; through graphic forms they are illustrated according to this order. Graphic presentation adds to the meaning of facts by throwing it into relief. It does not replace tabulation; it complements it. In selecting diagrams or other graphic forms serviceability, simplicity and truthful representation of the facts should be the aim. There is always a best form in graphics as there is in tabulation. The same requirements as to order of arrangement of details, spacing, size of the figure, and methods of making the relations between facts emphatic, apply here as they do in tabulation. The physical work of charting may be assigned to the relatively inexperienced; the choice of the forms to use must be made by one who not only understands precisely what is to be shown, the psychology of the persons to whom it is addressed, but also appreciates the peculiar appeal of the different illustrations that are available. In choosing graphic figures certain elementary but at the same time fundamental principles should be followed. First.--Avoid figures which must be read in two or more dimensions. Second.--Guard against confusing the apparent with the real. In this connection, lines or bars...
