At that time no one anticipated that by reason of a world-wide war the European members would be unable to attend. The international character of the Congress was preserved as much as possible by the co-operation of the various countries concerned, whose governments accepted the invitation to furnish representatives from among their European commissioners. The members attending the Congress and the papers presented were almost entirely American. The absence of most of the active members of former Congresses, and the lack of their valuable papers and discussion, were serious deficiencies. The Congress, however, was valuable as an indication of the progress and extent of viticulture in the United States and the...
